To Whom it May Concern,

As Tumblr's Community Manager, I have had the pleasure of working with Kate Sutter for 9 months. From 9/12 to 5/13, she worked at Tumblr as the Community Intern.

Kate consistently performed above and beyond my expectations for an intern. Because of this, I asked her to stay on the Community team several months longer than most of the Interns here at Tumblr. Her day to day responsibilities included filling product requests and mailing them out, doing venue research for events and understanding the culture of Tumblr users. For a blogging platform that houses over 100 million blogs, this is no easy feat.

Though her primary job was based in Community, her perseverance did not go unnoticed by other employees within the company. Kate often helped out other employees and departments upon request.

When Kate encounters a problem, she quickly absolves it. I never felt the need to look over her shoulder or check her work. Every assignment handed to her is an assignment that is properly handled.

I have no doubt that Kate will continue to excel wherever she finds herself next. She is kind, reliable and quick to learn. Her work ethic shines whether she is working independently or with others. Kate Sutter was a true asset to Tumblr. I have no doubt in my mind that these qualities will follow her on her next professional venture.

If you have any more questions about Kate and her time on my team, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Amandalyn Ferri
